It examined the royal instructions intended to be sent to the governors and recommended alterations where changes seemed desirable; to it colonial governors made regular reports; it recommended to the Crown suitable persons for appointment as governors or councilors; made an annual report of the condition of the colonies; and exercised general supervision over colonial administration. The powers of the royal governors were embodied in their commissions and the instructions which were issued to them from time to time, or were drawn by implication from the vice-regal character of the governor s position. Besides the powers expressly conferred by the commission or letter of instructions, they inherited various traditions of the royal prerogative, such, for example, as the custom of approving the choice of the speaker by the assembly, which was not always a mere formality as in England, administering...
